THREE NEW PUBLICATIONS FROM ALEKSANDRA ZIOLKOWSKA BOEHM

Barbara Aleksandrowicz

A Polish-American author has “reached the heights” of achievement with the 2013 publication in the United States of three compelling and beautifully written books. The author, Aleksandra Ziolkowska-Boehm, well-recognized in her native Poland is worthy of similar recognition here.

Her three books each unfold stories of Polish citizens reacting to unbelievable adversity, cruelty and suffering commencing with the German Nazi occupation during World War II and the post war Communist reign in Poland.

The citizens whose stories are told include a true female war hero Kaia-Cezaria Iljin-Szymanska in "Kaia – Heroine of the 1944 Warsaw Rising".

Equally heroines are Joanna Synowiec, Stachna Wartanowicz, Anna Wartanowicz, Janina Krasicka, and Anna Bakowska, as widowed mothers whose sole continued acts of bravery were to protect, feed, clothe and to fight for survival of their children as told in "The Polish Experience through World War II – A Better Day Has Not Come".

Another hero of Polish literary fame returned to his beloved country, already under strict Communist control, to face surely anticipated harassment that he countered by quiet but effective acts of rebellion as told in "Melchior Wankowicz – Poland's Master of the Written Word".

The Polish people are known for their love of country, outstanding bravery in war or peace, and allegiance to Christian principles and doctrine. Each of the heroes exemplified in Ziolkowska-Boehm's three books are typical of these qualities, and in all frankness, it is very unlikely they could have survived the persecution and horrific conditions faced without such strengths. These books not only reveal truly amazing experiences of Polish people, but also enforce the strength of character of a nation.

We also recommend her other books:

"Open Wound of America" is about the current outlook of Native Americans. Her inspiration for the book was her great uncle, Korczak Ziolkowski, the sculptor of Crazy Horse in the Black Hills of South Dakota.
